

An estimated 60,000 children face starvation in North Korea as international sanctions slow aid deliveries, the United Nations Children's Fund said Tuesday.

World powers have imposed growing sanctions on North Korea for its nuclear and ballistic missile programmes, including fresh US penalties announced just last week.

Under United Nations Security Council resolutions, humanitarian supplies or operations are exempt from sanctions, Omar Abdi, Unicef deputy executive director, said.

'They don't want to take any risk of the sanctions,' Abdi told a news

'That is what makes it more difficult for us to bring things. So it takes a little bit longer, especially in getting money into the country.

'But also in shipping goods to DPRK. There are not many shipping lines that operate in that area,' he said.

Sanctions on fuel have been tightened, making it more scarce and expensive, Abdi added.

Reuters, citing three Western European intelligence sources, reported exclusively last week that North Korea shipped coal to Russia last year which was then delivered to South Korea and Japan in a likely violation of sanctions.

While sanctions do not directly affect aid, it slows the process of delivering vital supplies as extra checks need to be carried out, leaving the children at risk

'We are projecting that at some point during the year 60,000 children will become severely malnourished. This is the malnutrition that potentially can lead to death. It's protein and calorie malnutrition,' said Manuel Fontaine, director of UNICEF emergency programmes worldwide.

'So the trend is worrying, it's not getting any better.

'Diarrhoea related to poor sanitation and hygiene and acute malnutrition remains a leading cause of death among young children.'

Unicef is seeking $16.5 million this year to provide nutrition, health and water to North Koreans but faces 'operational challenges' due to the tense political context and 'unintended consequences' of sanctions, it said.

It cited 'disruptions to banking channels, delays in clearing relief entry ports, difficulty securing suppliers and a 160 percent increase in prices'.

'It's a very close, and tightly monitored intervention which is purely humanitarian in its essence,' Fontaine said.

Unicef is one of only a few aid agencies with access to the isolated region which suffered famine in the mid-1990s that killed up to three million
